Abstract

This contribution presents the findings of research conducted on the subject of society and religion in the Brno-Country District. The research involved the administration of an online questionnaire survey in a district surrounding the second-largest city in the Czech Republic. The survey collected responses from over 700 respondents using the Scale of Attitudes Towards Society and Religion. Prior to the quantitative data collection, qualitative data were also collected through semi-structured interviews conducted in person with local inhabitants. This approach resulted in the creation of initial publications on the subject, which address issues related to social cohesion, as well as tolerance and cooperation in the religious life of local Roman Catholic communities. The contents of these publications will also be included in this contribution.

Keywords: society, religion, social cohesion, cooperation, religious tolerance
